

Holy Womb Essence

Liberation

- ♥ Date Received on 5th August 2026, a windy day with a temperature of 23 degrees Celcius
- ♥ Time Around 10am
- ♥ Location Lake Markermeer, at the city beach of Hoorn (the Netherlands)
- ♥ Key words Becoming untethered, unbound

After staying overnight in the picturesque harbour town of Hoorn (the Netherlands), I decide to have a refreshing walk along the shore of its adjacent lake, the Markermeer.

As drive towards it, I remember learning at school that this lake has an interesting history. It used to be part of an inland sea, the Zuiderzee, which was tamed by a 32-kilometre-long dike built between 1927 and 1932.

Swiss glacier water

Soon the salty inland sea turned into a fresh water reservoir, and the sea's name (zee) was changed into lake (meer): the IJsselmeer. Its name is derived from the IJssel, a branch of the River Rhine that originates in Switzerland and feeds the IJsselmeer with around 30 billion litres of melted snow, glacier and rainfall water a day.

Over the following decades, two large sections of the immense IJsselmeer were converted into land, called polders, mainly for agriculture, together with a few towns. When a third polder was to be developed in front of the harbour town of Hoorn, a 26-kilometre-long dike marking its boundaries was built first. The Markermeer was born. For nearly thirty years, politicians discussed whether additional farmland was still needed, whilst the Markermeer became increasingly valuable for nature, birds, recreation and freshwater storage. Reclaiming the land would also have been very expensive. In 2003, the plans to reclaim the land were abandoned, and today you can take boat tours to watch bird colonies on offshore sandbanks.

This entire history of the Markermeer, which started in the year of my birth and unfolded during my lifetime, becomes vivid again as I drive towards Hoorn's city beach.

Pleasantly warm

When I tread on the sandy beach, the sun is pleasant, the sky is dotted with cotton-wool clouds, and a warm but quite strong breeze has kept away many of the usual visitors. In the distance, overlooking the water, I can see the signature landscapes of towns and cities close to the capital, Amsterdam.

I decide to paddle through the water to cool my body, heated by the intensely fiery sun over the past weeks. The temperature of the little waves around my ankles and feet is not too cold, pleasantly warmed by the summer season.

Then, out of the blue, I am prompted to receive an essence vibration, here and now, on the windy city beach of Hoorn.

It immediately sets a process of letting go in motion. The Markermeer water is drawing old, disturbing family patterning out of me – patterning that has recently surfaced in my awareness more strongly than ever. The burden of it bothered me quite a bit, and I had kept pondering which step to take to liberate myself, but now I am being cleansed of it by divine intervention.

Water and Wind are working together

The Elements of Water and Wind are working strongly together, taking me through a quick but thorough purification. Gentle waves take history away, whilst the wind cleanses my aura.

This purification of the family patterning that prevented me from fully claiming my core and womb area reaches quite a wide span – a range of ideas, beliefs and adopted fears pass before my third eye in a flash. I can see and feel them leaving, gently but decisively.

My recent wish to step out of the key burden of my heritage is being heard and delivered.

And as I gently but firmly step out of my family template, my heart becomes remarkably calm. Its usual traumatic trembling has stopped.

Next, I experience myself standing in my purest self, my essence. I have reached a state of utter inner peace. I feel and know that I am nothing other than my divine existence.

When I step out of the Markermeer, I feel totally liberated. This sudden shift surprises me, for my feet and ankles were only in the water for about five to seven minutes.

Beyond letting go

If you yearn to reach your pure self, beyond conditioning, and are ready to go through a liberating purification process, use this essence vibration that was given by the water of the Markermeer.

When receiving it, I heard the words letting go several times. Of course, it can be used for any situation in which you need to let go of the past and step into a new phase. But this wonderful vibration holds far more potential.

It is not just about letting something go, but about freeing yourself from what has shaped and limited you. It can liberate you to such an extent that you become free from conditioning.

The Liberation essence vibration can help you reach an unbound state of being, untethered.

Reinforcing mantra

To support your liberation process, speak the following mantra when taking this essence vibration:

I let go

I let go

I let go

I allow Water to cleanse me

I ask the Wind to carry my burden away

I am ready to live my divine template

I am ready to claim my core

I am ready to live my life

Guided by the Divine Light at the core of my Precious Womb

Dear one, may the pure power of the Swiss glacier water that found its way – all the way through Europe – to the Markermeer cleanse you and leave you unbound.

I wish you a gentle and smooth liberation process.
